

Health care shouldn't be a gamble. But without Enhanced Premium Tax Credits, many Hispanic families could see their insurance premiums skyrocket. Congress must continue these tax credits for individual Marketplace plans beyond 2025.

In Florida, too many Hispanic families already walk a tightrope to afford coverage. If Congress lets the Enhanced Premium Tax Credits expire, the safety net disappears — and so does peace of mind.

Small businesses power our state, and many are owned by hardworking Hispanic entrepreneurs. Losing the Enhanced Premium Tax Credits would make health insurance unaffordable for thousands of Florida entrepreneurs.

Individual Marketplace health plans have helped thousands of Hispanic business owners and workers in Florida stay covered. But if Congress lets the Enhanced Premium Tax Credits expire, we risk losing that progress, forcing small businesses to make difficult cuts.

When coverage costs go up, small businesses suffer. The Enhanced Premium Tax Credits make it possible for Hispanic entrepreneurs to stay healthy and keep their companies growing. Congress must extend these health care tax credits beyond 2025.

Being uninsured often means skipping checkups, delaying care, and turning to the ER when it's too late. The individual Marketplace has given millions of Hispanic small business owners and workers a way of buying high-quality coverage, made affordable by Enhanced Premium Tax Credits. That's why Congress cannot let those tax credits expire this year.

In Florida, nearly half of Hispanic enrollees in individual Marketplace plans say they'd go uninsured if the Enhanced Premium Tax Credits expire in 2025. That's not just a statistic — it's a warning sign. We need Congress to extend these tax credits now!

Florida's Hispanic workers, gig workers, and small business owners rely on the Enhanced Premium Tax Credits to maintain affordable health coverage. Letting them expire would hit our business community hard. Congress needs to extend these health care tax credits now!

From Hialeah to Orlando to Tampa, millions of Hispanic families depend on the Enhanced Premium Tax Credits to afford health coverage. Congress needs to know our stories — and protect our coverage beyond 2025.

Health coverage shouldn't be out of reach for the people who make Florida run. The Enhanced Premium Tax Credits help keep our businesses open, our families healthy, and our communities strong.
